Thubron's journey begins in Moscow, and from there he travels east across the Ural Mountains and into Siberia. He visits the cities of Novosibirsk, Irkutsk, and Yakutsk, and he spends time with a variety of people, including farmers, hunters, and reindeer herders. He also visits some of Siberia's most iconic landmarks, such as Lake Baikal and the Lena River.

Throughout his journey, Thubron is struck by the beauty and harshness of the Siberian landscape. He describes the vast forests, the frozen rivers, and the towering mountains. He also encounters the challenges of traveling in Siberia, such as the extreme cold and the lack of infrastructure. Despite the challenges, Thubron is drawn to the region's beauty and its people. He writes, "Siberia is a place that gets under your skin. It is a land of extremes, of beauty and harshness, of hope and despair. But it is also a land of great people, and I am grateful for the opportunity to have experienced it."
